The airline said her bag was lost, but her tracker said otherwise. So she flew to get it

Tales of airline passengers tracking their own lost bags are becoming ever more popular, as numbers of suitcases mishandled by airlines continue to spiral, and travelers invest in tracking devices.

But a passenger flying back to the airport where the tracker is showing, to collect it themselves when all official avenues fail? That's a new one.

Millennial Money: Mystery travel lets you focus on the fun, not the details

Travel planning can be a real chore. Booking flights, deciding on the right hotel and building an itinerary might be fun for some, but others dread it. That's why some travelers are opting for an unorthodox travel strategy that eliminates the planning stage altogether. It's called "mystery" or "surprise" travel, and the destination isn't revealed until the day of departure.
